"We take a learner-centered approach to education that develops the whole child, academically, socially and emotionally," Raskin said. Matt Watson, the upper school director at SCVi, said the open house presents parents an opportunity to learn about the educational options that a charter school provides.

"When I grew up, everyone attended the corner school. But we are now living in an age where parents have a great many options when it comes to their child's education, and charter schools offer many unique opportunities to parents," said Watson, who oversees grades 9-12 at SCVi. "The best way to make an informed decision is to visit. We look forward to the opportunity to speak with families and show them our program."
